Problem The ECS User Feedback Tool is in the process of being moved to a new developmental server named Starsky. The Starsky server lacks a secure environment in which to conduct administrative functions for the collection and analysis of data from the User Feedback Tool. As currently implemented, access to these functions require authentication with login and password information through an insecure interface that carries the potential for compromise of security. A secure interface will give developers the capability of producing functionality that is compliant to logical security control requirements. Any breach in security can result in loss of data in addition to loss of its integrity - the implications of which can go beyond the scope of the User Feedback Tool.
Proposed Solution The installation of Netscape Enterprise Server 2.0 on Starsky will enable fulfillment of the logical security control requirements as specified in the technical reference document.
